ROAST LEVELS

RAW COFFEE BEANS We start with only the highest possible grade of raw coffee bean. To find the best beans, we evaluate the following: bean size, color, uniformity of color and size, occurrence of any “defects” (which can be broken beans or stones within a sample) and most importantly the flavor of the roasted coffee when brewed. From any single country there will be several different grades of quality. We choose the best, which may carry a higher price, but produces a better cup of coffee.

AMERICAN ROAST RECOMMENDED AT THIS LEVEL: Guatemalan, Kenyan, Mexican, & Flavored.

The best raw coffee can be completely ruined by improper roasting. Correct roasting is a delicate balance of time and temperature. As coffee roasts, it changes from green to shades of golden yellow to its familiar brown. American Roast is the point where coffee beans have achieved their rich, medium brown color without any of coffee’s natural oils appearing on the surface. American Roast is the traditional roast level of American style coffee.

VIENNA ROAST VR RECOMMENDED AT THIS LEVEL: Colombian, Costa Rican, & Ethiopian Yirgacheffe.

Characterized by a slightly deeper color than American Roast, with small spots of oil present on the bean’s surface. This oil, which comes from within the coffee bean, is brought to the surface by the prolonged roasting time. The oil is important in the flavor of brewed coffee at higher roast levels, the greater presence of oil is what gives dark roasted coffee its distinguishable taste. Vienna Roast slightly intensifies the character of each coffee from different origins, as well as bringing out flavors that may remain hidden at the American Roast level. This is perhaps the most difficult roast level to master. Just moments too long in the roaster will result in too much oil on the bean’s surface. However, if the roast is finished seconds early, no oil will appear.

FULL CITY ROAST FC RECOMMENDED AT THIS LEVEL: Sumatra and Tanzanian Peaberry.

Distinguished by the deep brown color and heavy oil on the bean’s surface, Full City Roast further intensifies the unique character of each different coffee. Coffee does not become bitter when roasted darker. Bitterness in coffee is from poor quality beans or improper roasting. Dark roasted coffee should have a heavy, rich flavor, never burnt or bitter. The extended time in the roaster not only makes coffee darker, but also lighter in weight. Coffee contains water, which is turned into steam during the roasting process, and steam pressure causes the beans to swell in size. After roasting, coffee can weigh up to 25% less from the loss of the moisture within the bean.

FRENCH ROAST FR RECOMMENDED AT THIS LEVEL: Any coffee used as part of a blend.

Roasting coffee just slightly longer brings the beans to French Roast level. With more oil on the bean and a little darker color than Full City Roast, French Roast brings coffee to the height of its flavor. French Roast creates a deep, heavy flavor, some of the more subtle flavors of coffee will be hidden by the dark roasted smokiness. As coffee is roasted longer, the unique character of each varietal, such as Kenya or Sumatra, is diminished. All coffee would taste the same roasted dark enough.

ESPRESSO ROAST ER

Espresso Roast flirts on the edge of ruin. Coffee is roasted to its extreme limit. The beans are nearly black with very heavy oils. Seconds longer in the roaster will completely destroy all of the natural oil in the beans. Traditionally used for espresso and espresso-based drinks, this roast level has seen diminished use in favor of Espresso Blends which combine the flavors of different Single Origins at varying roast levels to create great espresso.

AROMA - brings across very subtle characters of coffee. Aroma is the combination of fragrances before and during drinking.

ACIDITY - a desirable characteristic. It is the sensation of dryness that coffee produces under the edges of your tongue and on the back of your palate. Acidity in coffee plays the same part as it does in the flavor of wine. It provides a sharp, bright, vibrant flavor. Coffee with-out good acidity will tend to taste flat.

BODY - the feeling coffee has in your mouth. The thickness, heaviness, or richness perceived when you drink it. Heavy bodied coffee is often described as earthy or nutty. Example: The way whole cream feels in your mouth compared to water.

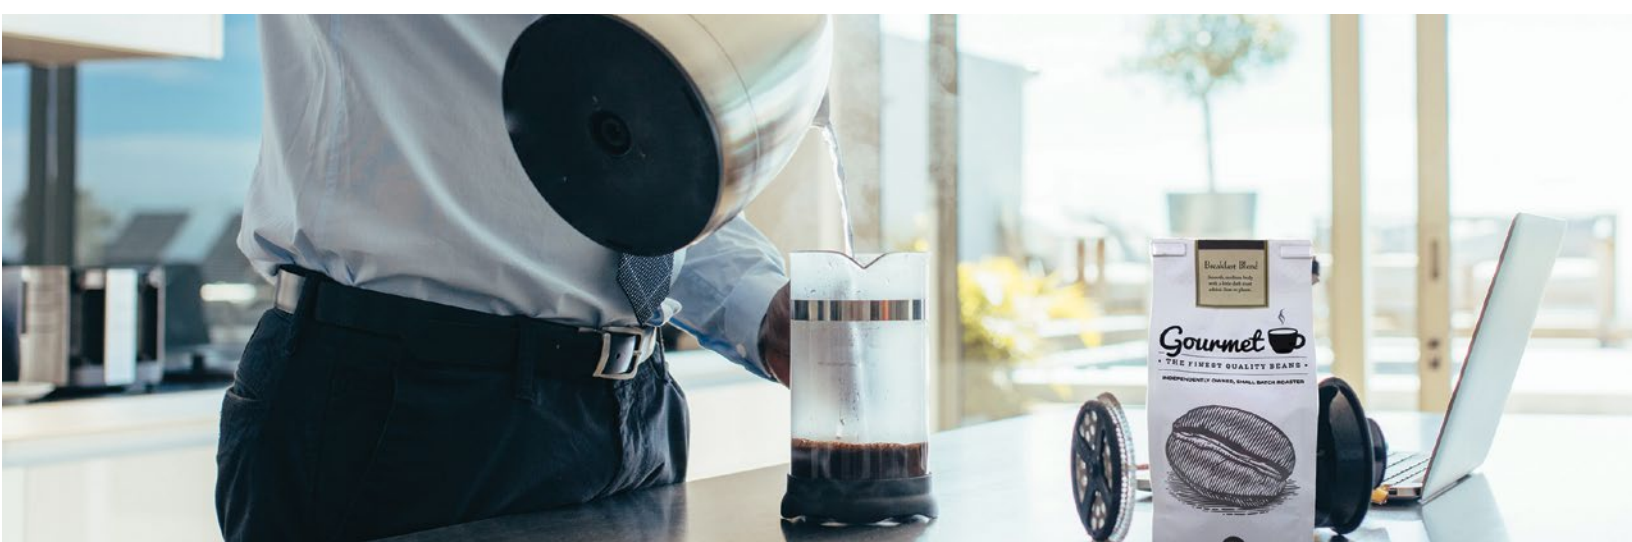

FLAVOR - all 3 of these characteristics combining together. Everyone has different perceptions of the components of coffee, and everyone will describe the same coffee in different ways. No coffee is better than any other coffee; it is a matter of personal taste.
